Therefore, the importance of of a temple 156 feet high, 200 feet long, and 170 feet wide, and was cast early and effective treatment cannot be in the year 749, after eight unsuccessful attempts. The figure is that of Buddha, and is seated cross-legged, as he is always shown, so that were the figure standing it would be very near-ty twice as high. Seated in this posi-tion, with the right hand uplifted, the oalm outward, and the finger tips on a ine with the shoulders, this quaint rouze is fifty-three feet in hight above ts rather low and unimportant pedes

tal. The figure has seen many accidents, such as fires and earthquakes, and has lost its head on two occasions from the former cause, the present one being very ugly on account of the dark color of the bronze, the broad nostrils, and the swollen look that the designer has given the cheeks. It is supposed to be Buddha in attitude of deep con templation, a very favorite one for showing him in. The plates of bronze are from six to ten inches thick, and after being soldered together have been chiseled smooth. The face is sixteen feet long, nine and a half feet wide, and the width of the shoulders is tweny-nine feet. There are 966 curls on he head, and behind it is a huge wood en haso heavily gilded and nearly nighty feet in diameter. This image weighs 450 tons, and the records show that 500 pounds of gold and nearly 2,000 pounds of mercury were used with the tin and copper which make the brenze of which it is constructed. Second in importance, so far as size goes, but really a much better known igure, and in most ways more importent than that at Nara, is the great Buddah at Kamakura, about fifteen niles from Yokohama. It is seated in he open air near a small and prettily situated temple, and its huge head ca be seen for some time through the tree-tops as one approaches. The atti-tude is more graceful and comfortable than that of the tigure at Nava, and the face wears a very gentle and placid expression, the idea of deep thought being remarkably well attained. This figure is forty-nine feet seven inches high, has a circumference of ove ninety-seven feet at the base, the face is eight feet five inches long, the nose three feet nine inches, and each thum! is three feet around. In the center of the forehead is a bump of wisdom ten inches high. The eyes are of pure gold, and it is said that the records show that 1,500 pounds of that precious $40,000, is being built over the figure.
